The present invention relates generally to the field of display techniques and, more particularly, to a system and method for displaying images using multiple displays and electronic document modeling techniques. Three-dimensional (3-D) modeling and rendering techniques have been known for many years. Early 3-D modeling and rendering techniques were mostly of a painterly nature, in which various meshes of polygons were tessellated and then subjected to lighting and shading calculations. When images of these models were eventually displayed, the quality of the final image was no better than a simple photograph. More recent 3-D modeling and rendering techniques have employed modeling packages such as, for example, 3-D Studio Max from Discreet Logic, Inc. and LightWave from NewTek, Inc. (hereinafter LightWave). These modeling packages are programmatic in nature and very similar to other 3-D modeling packages such as, for example, SolidWorks from Dassault Systems. In this regard, the user of a 3-D modeling package designs a model using blocks (or other objects) that represent the model's elements. For example, a model of a dinosaur might be defined as a group of blocks to represent the model's bones, skin, scales, etc. Similarly, a model of a room might be defined as a group of blocks that represent the walls, floor, and other fixed elements of the room. A user defines the elements of the model by dragging and dropping blocks onto the desk of the modeling package. By so doing, the blocks are placed on the model and connections between blocks (and/or sub-blocks thereof) are established. Each block can then be further manipulated in order to design an object such as, for example, a dinosaur. Thus, the user can place each block and connect it to other blocks as needed in order to design the desired dinosaur. Once the dinosaur is designed, the user then
